After its last visit here, a few years ago, the Manchester Craft and Design Museum returned to Town Hall to host an event in early November, as part of its northern engagement programme. As part of the return, Manchester's Craft and Design Museum has launched a series of public activities around the museum's new exhibition: Make: a collection of objects that are on loan from the museum's Craft Collection; drawing workshop; ceramic workshop; and book and recipe workshop. The Make event – which runs until 4 December – features a diverse programme of talks, workshops, demonstrations and activities for all ages, in a beautiful location with open roof access to the sky. The opening programme – in the Liverpool Street Lecture Hall – featured talks by artists and designers including Ben Morris (who has been involved in workshops at Manchester Craft and Design Museum), Tim Watts, and craft historian Paddy Judge (all of whom were interviewed for the exhibition Make), as well as Oliver Hurley (a lecturer at Manchester Metropolitan University's School of Materials Science and Engineering). The event was especially noteworthy for its programme of guided visits, the majority given by members of staff at the museum. The public were invited to attend two guided walks around the museum's gallery spaces, and two guided visits to the gardens. All of the visitors were given opportunities to experience the craft collections, and there was ample opportunity to discuss the exhibition with our staff members. No visitor was allowed to leave without having seen some of the works that are on display in the exhibition Make. And many of the visitors left with more knowledge of this selection of objects than they had before they visited the museum. This is exactly the sort of effect the museum hopes to achieve with these public activities. The Make event is in part a continuation of the museum's northern engagement programme, which has been developing gradually since the museum relaunched 50b96ab0b6

The Mpc is not designed to lock the user out of the MPC or the software. Most electric vehicle (EV) models are designed to be used with battery packs. Such "plug-in" (P) EV models, therefore, require a grid-in option to draw power from the public electric utility grid. To that end, a vehicle operator may be required to make a connection to the grid and then navigate through a series of tests before the vehicle is allowed to draw power. Of course, the design of the connector to the grid is typically based on a physical connection between a vehicle battery pack and the grid. Such physical connection, however, limits the applicable range of the vehicle as access to the grid is not readily available outside of a city or limited access areas. Additionally, such physical connection may reduce the useful life of the vehicle. Progress in the management of idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis. Idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis (IPF) is a chronic, progressive, and ultimately fatal interstitial lung disease (ILD) that affects nearly all elderly adults. Despite recent advances in knowledge of IPF pathophysiology and identification of several therapeutic options, IPF remains a lethal disease with no effective disease-modifying therapies. Recent studies have highlighted the multisystemic nature of IPF, in which the extensive histological and physiological alterations are not limited to the lung. Current research has demonstrated the tight relationship between lung fibroblasts and extracellular matrix remodeling with respect to IPF pathophysiology, disease progression, and response to conventional therapies. Additionally, the potential role of early
